After frost, grain-sorghum stubble yellow as wheat
hid pairs of pheasants scattered on the plains.
Seven, eight times a season we searched the rows, shotguns stiff, dogs sniffing ahead,
and took our necessary meat.

After the last snow
we torched the stalks,
the orange flames
spreading like a prairie fire, covering the fields with soot.

March, after the dirt cooled, my father plowed the charred earth brown again,
like flipping a reversible jacket seam by seam.
Unless it rained, he ditched,
for two weeks irrigated, and in May
he rigged the tractor up, lowered four worn plows into the ground
and planted grain.
